Syn.: clause. A clause is a short sentence forming a distinct part of a composition, or in more extended use a distinct and separable statement forming part of a legal or state document, as of a will, an indictment, etc.; a phrase is a group of words conveying a single idea, and forming a distinct part of a sentence. In grammar, a clause is a simple sentence which is combined with some other sentence or sentences, so as to form a complex or compound sentence. A simple sentence standing alone is not, in grammatical use, called a clause, but every clause of a complex or compound sentence is a simple sentence. Thus, the clause always contains a subject and predicate. A phrase does not contain a subject and predicate, but it may include as many words as a clause. Thus, in the sentence, "He saw the danger, and sought to escape," the words "He saw the danger" constitute a clause, having subject and predicate; but in the sentence, "Seeing the danger, he sought to escape," the words "Seeing the danger" do not form a clause but a phrase, because lacking subject and predicate. SYN.: abject, base, contemptible, despicable, lamentable, miserable, mournful, moving, paltry, pathetic, piteous, pitiable, sorrowful, touching, woful, wretched. Pitiful originally signified full of pity; as, "the Lord is very pitiful and of tender mercy," James v, 11; but this usage is now archaic, and the meaning in question is appropriated by such words as merciful and compassionate. Pitiful and pitiable now refer to what may be deserving of pity, pitiful being used chiefly for that which is merely an object of thought, pitiable for that which is brought directly before the senses; as, a pitiful story; a pitiable object; a pitiable condition. Since pity, however, always implies weakness or inferiority in that which is pitied, pitiful and pitiable are often used, by an easy transition, for what might awaken pity, but does awaken contempt; as, a pitiful excuse; he presented a pitiable appearance. Piteous is now rarely used in its earlier sense of feeling pity, but in its derived sense applies to what really excites the emotion; as, a piteous cry. Syn.: commiseration, compassion, condolence, mercy, sympathy, tenderness. Pity is a feeling of grief or pain aroused by the weakness, misfortunes, or distresses of others, joined with a desire to help or relieve. Sympathy (feeling or suffering with) implies some degree of equality, kindred, or union; pity is for what is weak or unfortunate, and so far, at least, inferior to ourselves; hence, pity is often resented where sympathy would be welcomed. We have sympathy with one in joy or grief, in pleasure or pain, pity only for those in suffering or need: we may have sympathy with the struggles of a giant or the triumphs of a conqueror; we are moved with pity for the captive or the slave. Pity may be only in the mind, but mercy does something for those who are its objects. Compassion, like pity, is exercised only with respect to the suffering or unfortunate, but combines with the tenderness of pity the dignity of sympathy and the active quality of mercy. Commiseration is as tender as compassion, but more remote and hopeless; we have commiseration for sufferers whom we can not reach or can not relieve. Condolence is the expression of sympathy. See MERCY.—Ant.: barbarity, brutality, cruelty, ferocity, hard-heartedness, harshness, inhumanity, mercilessness, pitilessness, rigor, ruthlessness, severity, sternness, truculence.—Prep.: pity on or upon that which we help or spare; pity for that which we merely contemplate; "have pity upon me, O ye my friends," Job xix, 21; "pity for a horse o'erdriven," TENNYSON In Memoriam lxiii, st. 1.—pit'i-less, a. 1. Destitute of pity; cruel. 2. Exciting no pity. Syn.: advocate, argue, ask, beg, beseech, entreat, implore, press, solicit, urge. To plead for one is to employ argument or persuasion, or both, in his behalf, usually with earnestness or importunity; similarly one may be said to plead for himself or for a cause, etc., or with direct object, to plead a case; in legal usage, pleading is argumentative; in popular usage, pleading always implies some appeal to the feelings. One argues a case solely on rational grounds and supposably with fair consideration of both sides; he advocates one side for the purpose of carrying it, and under the influence of motives that may range all the way from cold self-interest to the highest and noblest impulses; he pleads a cause, or pleads for a person, with still more intense feeling. Beseech, entreat, and implore imply impassioned earnestness, with direct and tender appeal to personal considerations. Press and urge imply determined or perhaps authoritative insistence. Solicit is a weak word denoting merely an attempt to secure one's consent or cooperation, sometimes by sordid or corrupt motives. Syn.: agreeable, attractive, good-natured, kind, kindly, obliging, pleasing, pleasurable. That is pleasing from which pleasure is received, or may readily be received, without reference to any action or intent in that which confers it; as, a pleasing picture; a pleasing landscape. Whatever has active qualities adapted to give pleasure is pleasant; as, a pleasant breeze; a pleasant (not a pleasing) day. As applied to persons, pleasant always refers to a disposition ready and desirous to please; one is pleasant, or in a pleasant mood, when inclined to make happy those with whom he is dealing, to show kindness and do any reasonable favor. In this sense pleasant is near akin to kind, but kind refers to act or intent, while pleasant stops with the disposition; many persons are no longer in a pleasant mood if asked to do a troublesome kindness. Pleasant keeps always something of the sense of actually giving pleasure, and thus surpasses the meaning of good-natured; there are good-natured people who by reason of rudeness and ill breeding are not pleasant companions. A pleasing face has good features, complexion, expression, etc.; a pleasant face indicates a kind heart and an obliging disposition, as well as kindly feelings in actual exercise; we can say of one usually good-natured, "on that occasion he did not meet me with a pleasant face." Pleasant in the sense of gay, merry, jocose (the sense is still retained in pleasantry) is now rare, and would not be understood outside of literary circles. English nouns regularly form their plurals by adding s or es, according to euphony, to the singular; most nouns ending in f change the f to v and add es; as, wolf, wolves. Nouns ending in y change it to ies if it is preceded by a consonant, as; body, bodies; or merely add an s if it is preceded by a vowel; as, donkey, donkeys. Some nouns of Anglo-Saxon origin have an irregular plural in en, as child, children; ox, oxen; or by a vowel change; as, mouse, mice; goose, geese; man, men; tooth, teeth. A few nouns retain the singular form unchanged in the plural; as, deer, fish, hose, moose, series, sheep, species, vermin. Some such nouns, especially the names of animals, have also an alternative plural regularly formed; as, fish, fish or fishes. In such cases there is usually a distinction in meaning or usage: fish, for instance, denoting a number or quantity as a whole, and fishes referring more distinctively to the individuals. Many words of foreign derivation retain the plural form peculiar to the languages from which they are severally derived; as, addendum, addenda; antithesis, antitheses; crisis, crises; datum, data, etc. Many nouns of this class have also a plural of the regular English form; as, appendix, appendixes or appendices; beau, beaus or beaux; cherub, cherubs or cherubim; focus, focuses or foci; index, indexes or indices, etc. Compounds commonly form the plural regularly by adding s or es to the complete word; as, armful, armfuls; cut-throat, cutthroats; football, footballs. The first element of a compound composed of two nouns, even if it should refer to a whole class of things, is never pluralized. We say bookkeeper, hair-brush, not bookskeeper or hairs-brush. If the last element of the compound forms its plural irregularly, the same form usually appears in the plural of the compound; as, footman, footmen. Nouns that end in -man, but are not compounds, form the plural regularly by adding s, as Mussulman, Mussulmans. But compounds in which the principal word forms the first element change that element to form the plural; as, father-in-law, fathers-in-law; son-in-law, sons-in-law. See TEMPLAR. la, aperture to admit light; p, polarizer; d, disk, half of right-handed and half of left-handed quartz; l, liquid to be examined; q, plate of quartz; b, double quartz plate (with rotatory power opposite to q), whose thickness can be varied by the screw; t, lenses for adjusting the instrument to the tint to which the observer's eye is most sensitive; a, analyser. If the liquid (l) has no rotatory power, both halves of the double disk (d), when observed through a thickness of b that exactly balances q, appear of the same tint. If it has rotatory power, the halves appear of different tints, and the degree is measured by the alteration of thickness of b necessary to counteract it and make the halves again uniform.

Light may be polarized (1) by reflection, at an angle which differs for different substances, or (2) by transmission, as (a) through most crystals, or (b) obliquely through a bundle of sheets of glass. If light thus treated be examined by subjecting it to such reflection or transmission a second time, it is found that in certain positions of the reflector or crystal it will pass most easily, while in the positions at right angles to these it will be totally quenched, and in intermediate positions it will pass partially. The plane of polarization is altered or rotated by the passage of polarized light through a quartz crystal or through solutions of various substances, by reflection from a magnetic pole, or by transmission through a medium in a magnetic field. Such rotation is called rotary polarization, which takes two directions, right-handed and left-handed. After reflection from a metal light exhibits phenomena which make it probable that its vibrations are in closed curves rather than straight lines. Its polarization is then said to be circular or elliptic, as the case may be. 3. Elec. In a voltaic cell, the collection of a gas (usually hydrogen) on the surface of the negative element.—angle of polarization or polarizing angle, that angle of reflection from a plane surface at which light is polarized.—plane of p., the plane in which the light-vibrations occur when polarized.

Syn.: accomplished, civil, complaisant, courteous, courtly, cultivated, cultured, elegant, genteel, gracious, obliging, polished, urbane, well-behaved, well-bred, well-mannered. A civil person observes such propriety of speech and manner as to avoid being rude; one who is polite (literally polished) observes more than the necessary proprieties, conforming to all that is graceful, becoming, and thoughtful in the intercourse of refined society. A man may be civil with no consideration for others, simply because self-respect forbids him to be rude: but one who is polite has at least some care for the opinions of others, and if polite in the highest and truest sense, which is coming to be the prevailing one, he cares for the comfort and happiness of others in the smallest matters. Civil is a colder and more distant word than polite; courteous is fuller and richer, dealing often with greater matters, and is used only in the good sense. Courtly suggests that which befits a royal court, and is used of external grace and stateliness without reference to the prompting feeling; as, the courtly manners of the ambassador. Genteel refers to an external elegance, which may be showy and superficial, and is used as is thus inferior to polite or courteous. Urbane refers to a politeness that is genial and successful in giving others a sense of ease and cheer. Polished refers to external elegancies of speech and manner without reference to spirit or purpose; as, a polished gentleman or a polished scoundrel; cultured refers to a real and high development of mind and soul, of which the external manifestation is the smallest part. Complaisant denotes a disposition to please or favor beyond what politeness would require.—Ant.: awkward, bluff, blunt, boorish, brusk, clownish, coarse, discourteous, ill-behaved, ill-bred, ill-mannered, impertinent, impolite, impudent, insolent, insulting, raw, rude, rustic, uncivil, uncouth, unpolished, untaught, untutored.—po-lite'ly, adv.

Syn.: adjourn, defer, delay, hold in abeyance, lay by, lay aside, procrastinate, put by, put off. Adjourn (L. ad, to, + diurnus, daily, from dies, day) signifies literally to put off to another day, and, hence, to any future time. A deliberative assembly may adjourn to another day or to another hour of the same day, and resume business where it left off, as if there had been no interval. To adjourn "without day" (sine die) is etymologically a contradiction in terms, but is in approved use, such adjournment terminating the existence of the body so adjourned. This may be obviated, when no day can be fixed, by adjourning to meet at the call of the president or other officer. In common usage, to adjourn a matter is to hold it in abeyance until it may be more conveniently or suitably attended to; in such use defer and postpone are close synonyms of adjourn; defer (L. dis, apart, + fero, bear) is simply to lay or put aside temporarily; to postpone (L. post, after, + pono, place) is strictly to lay or put aside until "after" something else occurs, or is done, known, obtained, or the like; as, to postpone one's departure until after a friend's arrival; but postpone is often used without such limitation. Adjourn, defer, and postpone all imply definite expectation of later consideration or action; delay is much less definite, while procrastinate is piquantly vague. One may adjourn, defer, delay, or postpone a matter intelligently and for good reason; he procrastinates through indolence, negligence, or irresolution; one who procrastinates gives no assurance that he will ever act. Compare HINDER; PROCRASTINATE.—Ant.: act, act on, complete, consummate, dispatch, do, expedite, hasten, hurry, quicken, take up, urge forward, urge on.—post-pone'ment, n. Syn.: see RESPITE.—post-pon'er, n.

Syn.: accurate, careful, correct, definite, distinct, exact, explicit, faultless, flawless, minute, nice, particular, perfect, rigid, right, scrupulous, strict. Accurate, correct, definite, exact, precise, all denote absolute conformity to some external standard. Accurate (L. ad, to, + cura, care) indicates conformity secured by scrupulous care. An accurate measurement or account can be verified and found true in all particulars. The native English word careful (AS. caru, cearu, care) carries less sharp certainty; careful stupidity may blunder, accurate stupidity is almost unthinkable. Exact (L. ex, out, + ago, drive) indicates that which is worked out to the utmost limit of requirement in every respect; precise (L. precido, cut off, from præ, before, + cædo, cut) refers to a like conformity secured by cutting off all excess. Exact and precise are often interchangeable: but, as filling out is a greater achievement than cutting off, exact is the higer word; we speak of the exact sciences, not of the precise sciences. Hence, precise has often an invidious meaning, denoting excessive care of petty details: we speak of the martinet as insufferably precise, not insufferably exact. Correct (L. con-, together, + rego, rule) applies to a required or enforced correspondence with a standard. This is especially seen in the use of the verb; the printer corrects the proof. That is correct which is free from fault or mistake. Thus correct is lower in the scale than accurate, exact, or precise, which are positive, indicating attainment of the right, while correct is negative, denoting avoidance of the wrong; a composition may be correct, but intolerably dull; to speak of a correct statement or discrimination is to give very mild approval; an accurate statement or an exact discrimination is felt to have some noticeable excellence. Compare CORRECT; MINUTE.—Ant.: careless, doubtful, erroneous, false, faulty, inaccurate, inexact, loose, mistaken, misty, nebulous, untrue, vague, wrong.

pre-clude', 1 pri-klūd'; 2 pre-çlud', vt. [PRE-CLUD'ED[4]; PRE-CLUD'ING.] 1. To render impossible or ineffectual by antecedent action; prevent. 2. To shut out; exclude. [< L. præ, before, + claudo, shut.]

Syn.: obviate, prevent. To obviate, strictly to stop the way of or remove from the way, is to prevent by interception, so that something that would naturally withstand or disturb may be kept from doing so; to preclude, to close or shut in advance, is to prevent by anticipation or by logical necessity; walls and bars precluded the possibility of escape; a supposition is precluded; a necessity or difficulty is obviated. Prevent, which at first had only the anticipatory meaning, has come to apply to the stopping of an action at any stage, so as to negative its completion or conclusion; the enemy passed the outworks and were barely prevented from capturing the fortress. [< L. præ, before, + venio, come.]

Syn.: anticipate, forestall. The original sense of prevent, to come before, act in advance of, which is now practically obsolete, was still in good use when the authorized version of the Bible was made, as appears in such passages as "When Peter was come into the house, Jesus prevented him" (that is, accosted him first), Matt. xvii, 25; "Thou preventest him with the blessings of goodness" (that is, by sending the blessings before the desire is formulated or expressed), Ps. xxi, 3. Anticipate is now the only single word usable in this sense; to forestall is to take or act in advance in one's own behalf and to the prejudice or hindrance of another or others, as in the phrase "to forestall the market." But to anticipate is very frequently used in the favorable sense; as, his thoughtful kindness anticipated my wish (that is, met the wish before it was expressed); or we say "I was about to accost him when he anticipated me" (by speaking first); or one anticipates a payment (by making it before the time). For the present use of prevent, see synonyms for HINDER; PRECLUDE; PROHIBIT.—pre-vent'a-bl(e)‡, a. That may be prevented. pre-vent'i-bl(e)‡. — pre-vent'a-bil'i-ty, n. pre-vent"i-bil'i-ty†.—pre-vent'er, n. One who or that which prevents.—pre-ven'tion, n. 1. The act of preventing, or the state of being prevented. 2. A hindrance; obstruction. 3. A preventive.—pre-ven'tiv(es. I. a. Intended or serving to ward off harm. II. n. That which prevents or hinders, as a medicine to ward off disease; a precautionary measure. -ly, adv.

pre'vi-ous, 1 prī'vi-us; 2 prē'vi-ŭs, a. Being or taking place before something else; antecedent; prior. [< L. præ, before, + via, way.]

Syn.: antecedent, anterior, earlier, foregoing, former, forward, front, introductory, precedent, preceding, preliminary, prior. Antecedent may denote simple priority in time, implying no direct connection between that which goes before and that which follows; as, the striking of one clock may be always antecedent to the striking of another with no causal connection between them. Antecedent and previous may refer to that which goes or happens at any distance in advance, preceding is limited to that which is immediately or next before; an antecedent event may have happened at any time before; the preceding transaction is the one completed just before the one with which it is compared; a previous statement or chapter may be in any part of the book that has gone before; the preceding statement or chapter comes next before without an interval. Previous often signifies first by right; as, a previous engagement. Foregoing is used only of that which is spoken or written; as, the foregoing statements. Anterior, while it can be used of time, is coming to be employed chiefly with reference to place; as, the anterior lobes of the brain. Prior bears exclusive reference to time, and commonly where that which is first in time is first also in right; as, a prior demand. Former is used of time, or of position in written or printed matter, not of space in general. We can say former times, a former chapter, etc., but not the former part of a garden; we should say the front part of the garden, the forward car of a train. Former has a close relation, or sharp contrast, with something following; the former always implies the latter, even when not fully expressed, as in Acts i, 1, and Eccles. vii, 10. Compare ANTECEDENT.—Ant.: after, concluding, consequent, following, hind, hinder, hindmost, later, latter, posterior, subsequent, succeeding.—Prep.: Such was the state of things previous to the revolution. [Previous to is often used adverbially, in constructions where previously to would be more strictly correct; as, it was done previous to my departure.]

The quality of possessing value; worth; especially, high value. 3†. A prize. [< OF. pris, < L. pretium, price.]

Syn.: charge, cost, expenditure, expense, outlay, value, worth. The cost of a thing is all that has been expended upon it, whether in discovery, production, refinement, decoration, transportation, or otherwise, to bring it to its present condition in the hands of its present possessor; the price of a thing is what the seller asks for it. In regular business, as a rule the seller's price on his wares must be more than their cost to him; when goods are sold, the price the buyer has paid becomes their cost to himself. In exceptional cases, when goods are sold at cost, the seller's price is made the same as the cost of the goods to him, the cost to the seller and the cost to the buyer becoming then identical. Price always implies that an article is for sale; what a man will not sell he declines to put a price on; hence, the significance of the taunting proverb "that every man has his price." Value is the estimated equivalent for an article, whether the article is for sale or not; the market value is what it would bring if exposed for sale in the open market; the intrinsic value is the inherent utility of the article considered by itself alone; the market value of an old and rare volume may be very great, while its intrinsic value may be practically nothing. Value has always more reference to others' estimation (literally, what the thing will avail with others) than worth, which regards the thing in and by itself; thus, intrinsic value is a weaker expression than intrinsic worth. Charge has especial reference to services, expense to minor outlays; as, the charges of a lawyer or physician; traveling expenses; household expenses.—market price, the price that anything will bring in the open market.—to set a p. on one's head, to offer a reward for the capture of a person, dead or alive.—price'-cur"rent, n. A statement of the ruling price of stocks, merchandise, or other property at a given time or statedly, or the price itself. —p.-list, n. A catalog of goods in which the prices are named. —price'less, a. 1. Beyond price or valuation; invaluable. 2†. Syn.: conceit, ostentation, self-complacency, self-conceit, self-esteem, self-exaltation, self-respect, vainglory, vanity. Conceit and vanity are associated with weakness, pride with strength. Conceit may be founded upon nothing, pride is founded upon something that one is, or has, or has done; vanity, too, is commonly founded on something real, but far slighter than would afford foundation for pride. Vanity is eager for admiration and praise, is elated if they are rendered and pained if they are withheld, and seeks them; pride could never solicit admiration or praise. Conceit is somewhat stronger than self-conceit. Self-conceit is ridiculous; conceit is offensive. Self-respect is a thoroughly worthy feeling; self-esteem is a more generous estimate of one's own character and abilities than the rest of the world is ready to allow. Vainglory is more pompous and boastful than vanity. There is a worthy and honorable pride, as in one's achievements, or character, or in one's position, especially as connected with the just expectations of others, or with one's obligations to them, which is closely synonymous with self-respect, keeping one up to his own best and highest action, and withholding from all that is ignoble or unworthy. SYN.: aboriginal, ancient, autochthonic, immemorial, indigenous, native, old, original, primal, primary, prime, primitive, primordial, pristine. Aboriginal (L. ab, from, origo, origin) signifies pertaining to the aborigines or earliest known inhabitants of a country in the widest sense, including not merely human beings, but inferior animals and plants as well. Primeval (L. primum, first, and ævum, age) signifies strictly belonging to the first ages, earliest in time, but often only the earliest of which man knows or conceives, immemorial. Prime and primary may signify either first in time, or more frequently first in importance; primary has also the sense of elementary or preparatory; we speak of a prime minister, a primary school. Primal is chiefly poetic, in the sense of prime; as, the primal curse. Primordial is first in an order of succession or development; as, a primordial leaf. Primitive frequently signifies having the original characteristics of that which it represents, as well as standing first in time; as, the primitive church. Primitive also very frequently signifies having the original or early characteristics without remoteness in time. Primeval simplicity is the simplicity of the earliest ages; primitive simplicity may be found in retired villages now. Pristine is an elegant word, used almost exclusively in a good sense of that which is original and perhaps ancient; as, pristine purity, innocence, vigor. That which is both an original and natural product of a soil or country is said to be *indigenous. In a thing good in itself all advance or progress is improvement; there is a growing tendency to restrict the words to this favorable sense, using increase indifferently of good or evil; one may say without limitation "I am an advocate of progress." Syn.: debar, disallow, forbid, hinder, inhibit, interdict, preclude, prevent. Debar is said of persons, disallow of acts. one is debarred from anything when shut off as by some irresistible authority or necessity· one is prohibited from an act in express terms: he may be debarred by silent necessity. An act is disallowed by the authority that might have allowed it; the word is especially applied to acts which are done before they are pronounced upon; thus, a government may disallow the act of its commander in the field or its admiral on the high seas. Inhibit and interdict are chiefly known by their ecclesiastical use. As between forbid and prohibit, forbid is less formal and more personal, prohibit more official and judicial, with the implication of readiness to use such force as may be needed to give effect to the enactment; a parent forbids a child to take part in some game or to associate with certain companions; the slave-trade is now prohibited by the leading nations of the world. Many things are prohibited by law which can not be wholly prevented, as gambling and prostitution; on the other hand, things may be prevented which are not prohibited, as the services of religion, the payment of bets or military conquest. THE LOST ARTS.

Ladies and Gentlemen:
I am to talk to you to-night about The Lost Arts—a lecture which has grown under my hand year after year, after year, and which belongs to that first phase of the lyceum system, before it undertook to meddle with political duties or angry and dangerous questions of ethics; when it was merely an academic institution, trying to win busy men back to books, teaching a little science, or repeating some tale of foreign travel, or painting some great representative character, the symbol of his age. I think I can claim a purpose beyond a moment's amusement in this glance at early civilization. I, perhaps, might venture to claim that it was a medicine for what is the most of our national character; and that is self-conceit,—an undue appreciation of ourselves, an exaggerated estimate of our achievements, of our inventions, of our contributions to popular comfort, and of our place, in fact, in the great procession of the ages. We seem to imagine that, whether knowledge will die with us, or not, it certainly began with us.
We have a pitying esteem, a tender compassion, for the narrowness, ignorance, and Darkness of the bygone ages. We seem to monopolize not only to ourselves, but to have begun, the era of light. In other words, we are all running with a fourth-day-of-July spirit of self-content. I am often reminded of the german whom the English poet Coleridge met at Frankfort. It seems to me, the American people might be painted in the chronic attitude of taking of its hat to itself and therefore it can be no waste of time, with an audience in such a mood, to take their eyes for a moment from the present civilization, and guide them back to that earliest possible era that history describes for us, if it were only for the purpose of asking whether we boast on the right line.
I might despair of curing the habit of boasting, but I might direct it better.
Wendell Phillips.
[1] This lectur was never revised by Mr. Phillips, and is imperfect in form and expression. But is the best report in existance.

Syn.: atonement, expiation, reconciliation, satisfaction. Atonement (at-one-ment), originally denoting reconciliation, or the bringing into agreement of those who have been estranged, is now chiefly used, as in theology, in the sense of some offering, sacrifice, or suffering sufficient to win forgiveness or make up for an offense. Expiation is the enduring of the full penalty of a wrong or crime. Propitiation is an offering, action, or sacrifice that makes the governing power propitious toward the offender. Satisfaction denotes the rendering a full legal equivalent for the wrong done. Propitiation appeases the lawgiver; satisfaction meets the requirements of the law.—Ant.: alienation, condemnation, estrangement, offense, penalty, punishment, reprobation.

Syn.: bid, offer, overture, proposition. An offer or proposal puts something before one for acceptance or rejection, proposal being the more formal word; a proposition sets forth truth (or what is claimed to be truth) in formal statement. The proposition is for consideration, the proposal for action; as, a proposition in geometry, a proposal of marriage; but proposition is often used nearly in the sense of proposal when it is a matter for deliberation; as, a proposition for the surrender of a fort. A bid is commercial and often verbal; as, a bid at an auction. An overture opens negotiation or conference, and the word is especially used of some movement toward reconciliation: as, overtures of peace. [< F. proposer, < pro-, forth, + poser, see POSE, 1, v.]

Syn.: purpose. In its most frequent use, propose differs from purpose in that what we purpose lies in our own mind as a decisive act of will, a determination; what we propose is offered or stated to others. In this use of the word, what we propose is open to deliberation, as what we purpose is not. In another use of the word one proposes something to or by himself which may or may not be stated to others. In this latter sense propose is nearly identical with purpose, and the two words have often been used interchangeably. But in the majority of cases what we purpose is more general, what we propose more formal and definite. I purpose to do right; I propose to do this specific thing because it is right. In the historic sentence, as used by Grant, "I propose to move immediately on your works," purpose would not have the same sharp directness. See PLAN; PURPOSE.—pro-pos'er, n. One who proposes; formerly, an orator; speaker.—prop"o-si'tion, n. 1. A scheme or measure proposed for acceptance or consideration; also, the act of proposing; as, a business proposition. 2. Gram. The statement of a judgment in words, including a subject and a predicate. 3. Math. A statement of a truth to be demonstrated (a theorem) or of an operation to be performed (a problem); loosely, the statement together with its demonstration. 4‖. An article of a creed. Syn.: acquire, bargain for, barter for, buy, get, obtain, procure, secure. Buy and purchase are close synonyms, in numerous cases freely interchangeable, but with the difference usually found between words of Anglo-Saxon and those of French or Latin origin. The Anglo-Saxon buy is used for all the homely and petty concerns of common life, the French purchase is often restricted to transactions of more dignity; yet the Anglo-Saxon word buy is commonly more emphatic, and in the higher ranges of thought appeals more strongly to the feelings. One may either buy or purchase fame, favor, honor, pleasure, etc., but when our feelings are stirred we speak of victory or freedom as dearly bought. "Buy the truth, and sell it not" (Prov. xxiii, 23) would be greatly weakened by the rendering "Purchase the truth, and do not dispose of it." Compare BUSINESS; GET; PRICE; SALE.—Ant.: barter, dispose of, exchange, put to sale, sell.—Prep.: purchase at a price; at a public sale; of or from a person; for cash; with money; on time.

[F., < L. quæstio(n-), < quæro, seek.]

Syn.: ask, challenge, dispute, doubt, inquire, interrogate, investigate, query, quiz. To ask is to seek information, favor, or aid; inquire, question, interrogate, respect only the obtaining of information. To interrogate is to examine formally or officially, commonly by a series of questions. Question comes close to the meaning of interrogate, but less formal; one may question a messenger at the door regarding the source of a message, the time of sending, etc. To question a person always implies a set determination to elicit truth, commonly by repeated and varied questions; the old-time examination by torture was called "the question." One may inquire casually and indifferently; he questions intently and resolutely. As applied to things, question has nearly the meaning of challenge; as, "I question the truth of that statement—the value of that article," or the like. To question a person implies some kind or claim of authority; one may answer, "By what right do you question me?" See INQUIRE. Syn.: doubt, inquiry, inquisition, interrogation, interrogatory, investigation, query. An inquiry seeks information for the benefit of the inquirer; a question may do the same, or may have the intent to perplex, confuse, or entrap the one of whom it is asked; one makes inquiry as to his way; we speak of idle or frivolous questions rather than of idle or frivolous inquiries. A query is a question more or less vaguely formulated and indefinite in purpose, often amounting to no more than a suspense of judgment, and a suggestion of future consideration; as, a proof-reader's query, which is often but an interrogation-point in the margin; a doubt may be termed a silent question, as a question is in many cases simply an expressed doubt. An interrogation or interrogatory is a formal inquiry. Interrogatory has a special legal use, denoting an inquiry in writing by order of a court, to be answered under oath. Syn.: accelerate, advance, dispatch, drive, drive on, expedite, facilitate, further, hasten, hurry, make haste, press forward, promote, speed, urge, urge on. To quicken, in the sense here considered, is to increase speed, move or cause to move more rapidly, as through more space or with a greater number of motions in the same time. To accelerate is to increase the speed of action or of motion. A motion whose speed increases upon itself is said to be accelerated, as the motion of a falling body, which becomes swifter with every second of time. To accelerate any work is to hasten it toward a finish, commonly by quickening all its operations in orderly unity toward the result. To dispatch is to do and be done with, to get a thing off one's hands. To dispatch an enemy is to kill him outright and quickly; to dispatch a messenger is to send him in haste; to dispatch a business is so bring it quickly to an end. Dispatch is commonly used of single items. To promote a cause is in any way to bring it forward, advance it in power, prominence, etc. To speed is really to secure swiftness; to hasten is to attempt it, whether successfully or unsuccessfully. Hurry always indicates something of confusion. The hurried man forgets dignity, appearance, comfort, courtesy, everything but speed; he may forget something vital to the matter in hand; yet, because reckless haste may attain the great object of speed, hurry has come to be the colloquial and popular word for acting quickly. To facilitate is to quicken by making easy; to expedite is to quicken by removing hindrances.—Ant.: check, clog, delay, drag, hinder, impede, obstruct, retard.—quick'en-er, n.

R r Roman. 𝔑 𝔯 Black Letter. ℛ r Script.

R, r, 1 är; 2 är, n. [ARS, R's, or Rs, 1 ärz; 2 ärs, pl.] 1. A letter: the eighteenth in the English alphabet.

Initial r is a comparatively infrequent letter. R, rh, or rrh pronounced as r, is followed only by a vowel sound. In words of Latin origin r is often the result of old assimilation: correct, from Lat. con-regere. The voicing of Indo-European s gave first z, then r; hence the so-called 'grammatical change' in was, were, from the same root. In a few words of French origin r has taken the place of older n; cf. order < Fr. ordre < Lat. ordinem. The same character is used for trills made in different parts of the mouth; that of the uvula is still common in French, and in some English dialects. In standard English the opening r- is so different from the closing -r that different signs (r and ɹ) are used for them in some phonetic systems. In standard English the trilled or "vibrated" r is almost absent; in Scotland and Ireland the trilled r is still marked in all positions, but perhaps more strongly by the Scots than by the Irish, while the rough guttural sound of r resulting from the vibration of the soft palate against the back part of the tongue, and which is better known as the burr, is common in northern England, especially in Northumberland. The last should not be confounded with the trill of the Scots, which is a lingual trill. Capital R is derived, through Latin, Greek, and Phenician, from the Egyptian hieroglyph which represented a mouth. 2. A symbol, signifying: (1) Math. (a) [R] The radius of a circle. (b) [r] A radius vector of coordinates. (c) In the Greek form (ρ), a radius of curvature. (2) In ancient Roman notation, eighty: with a line above (R̄), 80,000. (3) [R or r] Elec. Resistance. [OF., < L. ratio, reckoning, reason.]

Syn.: account, aim, argument, cause, consideration, design, end, ground, motive, object, principle, purpose. While the cause of any event, act, or fact, as commonly understood, is the power that makes it to be, the reason of or for it is the explanation given by the human mind; but reason is, in popular language, often used as equivalent to cause, especially in the sense of final cause. In the statement of any reasoning, the argument may be an entire syllogism, or the premises considered together apart from the conclusion, or in logical strictness the middle term only by which the particular conclusion is connected with the general statement. But when the reasoning is not in strict logical form, the middle term following the conclusion is called the reason; thus in the statement "All tyrants deserve death; Cæsar was a tyrant; therefore Cæsar deserved death," "Cæsar was a tyrant" would in the strictest sense be called the argument; but if we say "Cæsar deserved death because he was a tyrant," the latter clause would be termed the reason. See CAUSE; INTELLECT; MIND; MOTIVE; REASONING; UNDERSTANDING; WISDOM. Compare BECAUSE.—Prep.: the reason of a thing that is to be explained; the reason for a thing that is to be done.—by reason, or by reason of, on account of.—Goddess of Reason, an imaginary rea'son-ing, 1 rī'zŏn-ıŋ; 2 rē'şon-ing, n. The act or process of the mind by which from propositions known or assumed new propositions are reached; argumentation; also, the reasons, proofs, or arguments employed in such process.

Syn.: argument, argumentation, debate, ratiocination. Argumentation and debate always suppose two parties alleging reasons for and against a proposition; the same idea appears figuratively when we speak of a debate or an argument with oneself, as a debate between reason and conscience. Reasoning may be the act of one alone, as it is simply the orderly setting forth of reasons, whether for the instruction of inquirers, the confuting of opponents, or the clear establishment of truth for oneself. Reasoning may be either deductive or inductive. Argument or argumentation was formerly used of deductive reasoning only. With the rise of the inductive philosophy these words have come to be applied to inductive processes also; but while reasoning may be informal or even, as far as tracing its processes is concerned, unconscious, argument and argumentation strictly imply logical form. Compare INTELLECT; REASON.

As developed by Einstein it assumes that: (1) The velocity of light is a constant independent of its source, (b) of the system with respect to which it is measured, and (c) of the observer save for its motion in relation to other systems. (2) The velocity of light is a maximum unattainable by the velocity of any material body. The mass is not constant but dependent on its velocity.—relativity of knowledge, the doctrine that all knowledge is of and through relations, or by relating activity. Syn.: admonition, animadversion, blame, censure, check, chiding, comment, condemnation, criticism, denunciation, disapproval, objurgation, rebuke, reflection, reprehension, reprimand, reproach, reproval, upbraiding. Blame, censure, and disapproval may either be felt or uttered; comment, criticism, rebuke, reflection, reprehension, and reproof are always expressed. The same is true of admonition and animadversion. Comment and criticism may be favorable as well as censorious; they imply no superiority or authority on the part of him who utters them; nor do reflection or reprehension, which are simply turning the mind back upon what is disapproved. Reprehension is supposed to be calm and just, and with good intent; reflection is often from mere ill feeling, and is likely to be more personal and less impartial than reprehension; we often speak of unkind or unjust reflections. Rebuke, literally a stopping of the mouth, is administered to a forward or hasty person; reproof is administered to one intentionally or deliberately wrong; both words imply authority in the reprover, and direct expression of disapproval to the face of the person rebuked or reproved. Reprimand is official censure formally administered by a superior to one under his command. Animadversion is censure of a high, authoritative, and somewhat formal kind. Rebuke may be given at the outset, or in the midst of an action; animadversion, reflection, reprehension, reproof, always follow the act; admonition is anticipatory, and meant to be preventive. Check is allied to rebuke, and given before or during action; chiding is nearer to reproof, but with more of personal bitterness and less of authority. Compare CONDEMN; REPROVE.—Ant.: applause, approbation, approval, commendation, encomium, eulogy, panegyric, praise. re-prov′al‡.

Syn.: admonish, blame, censure, chasten, check, chide, condemn, find fault with, rebuke, remonstrate with, reprehend, reprimand, reproach, upbraid. To censure is to pronounce an adverse judgment that may or may not be expressed to the person censured; to reprove is to censure authoritatively, openly, and directly to the face of the person reproved; to rebuke is to reprove with sharpness, and often with abruptness, usually in the midst of some action or course of action deemed censurable; to reprimand is to reprove officially; to blame is a familiar word signifying to pass censure upon, make answerable, as for a fault; blame and censure apply either to persons or acts; reprove and rebuke are applied chiefly, and reprimand exclusively, to persons. To reproach is to censure openly and vehemently, and with intense personal feeling as of grief or anger; as, to reproach one for ingratitude; reproach knows no distinction of rank or character; a subject may reproach a king or a criminal a judge. To expostulate or remonstrate with is to mingle reasoning and appeal with censure in the hope of winning one from his evil way, expostulate being the gentler, remonstrate the severer word. Syn.: balky, fidgety, fractious, fretful, frisky, impatient, intractable, mulish, mutinous, obstinate, rebellious, recalcitrant, refractory, resentful, restless, skittish, stubborn, unruly, vicious. Balky, mulish, obstinate, and stubborn are synonyms of restive only in an infrequent if not obsolete use; the supposed sense of "tending to rest," "standing stubbornly still," is scarcely supported by any examples, and those cited to support that meaning often fail to do so. The disposition to offer active resistance to control by any means whatever is what is commonly indicated by restive in the best English speech and literature. Dryden speaks of "the pampered colt" as "restiff to the rein"; but the rein is not used to propel a horse forward, but to hold him in, and it is against this that he is "restiff." A horse may be made restless by flies or by martial music, but with no refractoriness; the restive animal impatiently resists or struggles to break from control, as by bolting, flinging his rider, or otherwise. With this the metaphorical use of the word agrees, which is always in the sense of such terms as impatient, intractable, rebellious, and the like; a people restive under despotism are not disposed to "rest" under it, but to resist it and fling it off.—Ant.: docile, gentle, manageable, obedient, peaceable, quiet, submissive, tractable, yielding. —res'tive-ly, adv.—res'tive-ness, n.

Syn.: abridge, bridle, check, circumscribe, confine, constrain, curb, hinder, hold, hold back, hold in, keep, keep back, keep down, keep in, keep under, repress, restrict, suppress. Constrain is positive; restrain is negative; one is constrained to an action; he is restrained from an action. Constrain refers almost exclusively to moral force. restrain frequently to physical force, as when we speak of putting one under restraint. To restrain an action is to hold it partially or wholly in check, so that it is under pressure even in performance; to restrict an action is to fix a limit or boundary which it may not pass, but within which it is free. To repress, literally to press back, is to hold in check, and perhaps only temporarily, that which is still very active; it is a feebler word than restrain; to suppress is finally and effectually to put down; suppress is a much stronger word than restrain; as, to suppress a rebellion. [OF., < L.ᴸᵁ re-, back, + volvo, roll, turn.]

Syn.: anarchy, confusion, disintegration, disorder, insubordination, insurrection, lawlessness, mutiny, rebellion, revolt, riot, sedition, tumult. The essential idea of revolution is a change in the form of government or constitution, or a change of rulers, otherwise than as provided by existing laws of succession, election, etc.; while such change is apt to involve armed hostilities, these make no necessary part of a revolution, which may be accomplished without a battle. Anarchy refers to the condition of a state when human government is superseded or destroyed by factions or other causes. Lawlessness is a temper of mind or condition of the community which may result in anarchy. Confusion, disorder, riot, and tumult are incidental and temporary outbreaks of lawlessness, but may not be anarchy. Insubordination is disobedience to constituted authorities on the part of one or of many individuals. Sedition is the plotting, rebellion the fighting, against the existing government. When rebellion is successful it is called revolution. A revolt is an uprising against existing authority without the comprehensive views of change in the form or administration of government that are involved in revolution. Anarchy, when more than temporary disorder, is a proposed disintegration of society, in which it is imagined that social order might exist without government. Slaves make insurrection; soldiers or sailors break out in mutiny; subject provinces rise in revolt. See CHANGE. Syn.: roll, rotate, turn. Any round body rolls which continuously touches with successive portions of its surface successive portions of another surface; a wagon-wheel rolls along the ground. To rotate is said of a body that has a circular motion about its own center or axis; to revolve is said of a body that moves about a center outside of itself. A revolving body may also either rotate or roll at the same time; the earth revolves around the sun, and rotates on its own axis; in popular usage, the earth is often said to revolve about its own axis, or to have a daily "revolution," but rotate and "rotation" are the more accurate terms. A cylinder over which an endless belt is drawn is said to roll as regards the belt, but it rotates as regards its own axis. Any object that is in contact with or connected with a rolling body is often said to roll; as, the car rolls smoothly along the track. Objects whose motion approximates or suggests a rotary motion along a supporting surface are also said to roll; as, ocean waves roll in upon the shore, or the ship rolls in the trough of the sea. Turn is a conversational and popular word often used vaguely for rotate or revolve, or for any motion about a fixed point, especially for a motion less than a complete "rotation" or "revolution"; a man turns his head or turns on his heel; a gate turns on its hinges. —Ant.: bind, chafe, grind, slide, slip, stick.—re-volv'a-bl (eᵖ), a. —re-volv'ing, pa.—revolving door, a door revolving like a turnstile about a central post, used in winter and consisting of four adjustable leaves so encased in a doorway as to exclude drafts of air.

S, s, 1 es; 2 ĕs, n. [s's, S's, or Ss, 1 es'iz; 2 ĕs'es, pl.] 1. The nineteenth letter in the English alphabet. It is the sign of a hiss, as in so, and is variously called a voiceless supradental sibilant, or 'spirant,' or 'point fricative.' The corresponding voiced spirant is the z of zest. If, instead of the tip of the tongue, the whole front surface of it is raised nearly to the roof of the mouth, we have the 'palatal spirant': voiceless in ship, voiced in azure. These sounds are indicated respectively by s, z, sh, and z. Any of them can be uttered by itself without a vowel, and indefinitely prolonged. The printed s following a vowel or a voiced consonant is generally pronounced z, but there are many exceptions: cars, does, but this, house. (See under Z.) Common substitutes for s are c (before any high vowel), ce for final, sc, se: racy, race, scent, tense. At the end of a monosyllable s is generally doubled: less, miss. In words of Latin origin s is often the result of assimilation: aspect, < Lat. ad-spicere.

The letter s, pronounced z after a voiced sound, is very common in inflection: speaks, goes, cat's, dog's, goats, foxes.

The voiced palatal spirant ʒ is written s, z, or (in a few French words) g: vision, azure, mirage. The sign zh is often used in phonetic alphabets. See under Z.

Capital S is from the hieroglyphic through Phenician, Greek, and Latin.

Seven sacraments are recognized by the Greek and Roman Catholic churches—baptism, confirmation, the Eucharist, penance, holy orders, matrimony, and extreme unction (or in the Greek Church, unction of the sick). Baptism, confirmation, and holy orders are held to leave a permanent impress or character on the soul. Baptism and the Lord's Supper are recognized as Christian ordinances (and to be literally observed) by almost all Christians. The word is sometimes applied to the ordinances of the old dispensation; as, the Mosaic sacrament of circumcision. 2. Specif., the Lord's Supper; the Eucharist: by Roman Catholics, spoken of as the blessed sacrament; as, the sick man received the sacrament. 3. A sign; symbol; type. 4. A mystery. 5†. The Roman military oath of allegiance on enlisting; hence, any oath or solemn ceremonial assumption of obligation. Syn.: ceremony, communion, Eucharist, Lord's Supper, observance, ordinance, rite, service, solemnity. A ceremony is a form expressing reverence, or at least respect; we may speak of religious ceremonies, the ceremonies of polite society, the ceremonies of a coronation, an inauguration, etc. An observance has more than a formal obligation, reaching or approaching a religious sacredness; a stated religious observance; viewed as established by authority is called an ordinance; viewed as an established custom, it is a rite, a religious act, especially a public act, viewed as a means of serving God is called a service. The terms sacrament and ordinance in the religious sense are often used interchangeably; the ordinance derives its sacredness from the authority that ordained it, while the sacrament possesses a sacredness due to something in itself, even when viewed simply as a representation or memorial. The Lord's Supper is the Scriptural name for the observance commemorating the death of Christ; the word communion is once applied to it (I Cor. x, 16), but not as a distinctive name; at an early period, however, the name communion was so applied, as denoting the communing of Christians with their Lord, or with one another. The term Eucharist describes the Lord's Supper as a thanksgiving service; it is also called by preeminence the sacrament.

Syn.: able, acute, apt, clear-sighted, discerning, intelligent, judicious, keen, keen-sighted, keen-witted, perspicacious, quick of scent, quick-scented, rational, sage, sensible, sharp, sharp-witted, shrewd, wise. Sagacious refers to a power of tracing the hidden or recondite by slight indications, as by instinct or intuition; with reference to inferior animals it is often applied to special keenness of sense-perception as of a hound in following a trail. In human affairs sagacious refers to a power of ready, far-reaching, and accurate inference from observed facts, perhaps in themselves very slight, that seems like a special sense; or to a similar readiness to foresee the results of any action, especially upon human motives or conduct—a kind of prophetic common sense. Sagacious is a broader and nobler word than shrewd, and not capable of the invidious sense which the latter word often bears; on the other hand, sagacious is less lofty than wise in its full sense, and more limited to practical matters. See ACUTE; ASTUTE; KNOWING; POLITIC; PRUDENT; WISE. Ant.: absurd, dull, foolish, futile, ignorant, irrational, obtuse, senseless, silly, simple, sottish, stupid, unintelligent.—sa-ga'cious-ly, adv.—sa-ga'cious-ness, n.—sa-gac'i-ty, n. The quality of being sagacious; ready and accurate; discernment and judgment; shrewdness. Syn.: allowance, compensation, earnings, fee, hire, honorarium, pay, payment, recompense, remuneration, requital, stipend, wages. An allowance is a stipulated amount furnished at regular intervals as a matter of discretion or gratuity, as of food to besieged soldiers, or of money to a child or ward. Compensation is a comprehensive word signifying a return for a service done. Remuneration is applied to matters of great amount or importance. Recompense is a still wider and loftier word, with less suggestion of calculation and market value; there are services for which affection and gratitude are the sole and sufficient recompense; earnings, fees, hire, pay, salary, and wages are forms of compensation and may be included in compensation, remuneration, or recompense. Pay is commercial, and strictly signifies an exact pecuniary equivalent for a thing or service, except when the contrary is expressly stated, as when we speak of high pay or poor pay. Wages denotes what a worker receives. Earnings is often used as exactly equivalent to wages, but may be used with reference to the real value of work done or service rendered, and even applied to inanimate things; as, the earnings of capital. Hire is distinctly mercenary or menial, but as a noun has gone out of popular use, while the verb to hire is common. Salary is for literary or professional work, wages for handicraft or other comparatively inferior service; a salary is regarded as more permanent than wages; an editor receives a salary, a compositor receives wages. Stipend has become exclusively a literary word. A fee is given for a single service or privilege, and is sometimes in the nature of a gratuity. Compare REQUITE.

Syn.: bargain, barter, change, deal, exchange, trade. A bargain is strictly an agreement or contract to buy and sell (see CONTRACT), but the word is often used to denote the entire transaction and also as a designation for the thing sold or purchased. Change and exchange are words of wider signification, applying only incidentally to the transfer of property or value; a change secures something different in any way or by any means; an exchange secures something as an equivalent or return, but not necessarily as payment for what is given. Barter is the exchange of one commodity for another, the word being used generally with reference to portable commodities. Trade in the broad sense may apply to vast businesses (as the book-trade), but as denoting a single transaction is used chiefly in regard to things of moderate value, when it becomes nearly synonymous with barter. Sale is commonly, and with increasing strictness, limited to the transfer of property for money, or for something estimated at a money value or considered as equivalent to so much money (compare definition 3). A deal in the political sense is a bargain, substitution, or transfer for the benefit of certain persons or parties against all others; as, the nomination was the result of a deal; in business it may have a similar meaning, but it frequently signifies simply a sale or exchange, a dealing; as, a heavy deal in stocks.—for sale, or on sale, offered or ready for sale.—sale'a-bl(e[2], sale"a-bil'i-ty. Same as SALABLE, SALABILITY.—sales'la"dy, n. [U. Syn.: disciple, learner, pupil, savant, student. The primary sense of a scholar is one who is being schooled; thence the word passes to denote one who is apt in school work, and finally one who is thoroughly schooled, master of what the schools can teach, an erudite, accomplished person: when used without qualification, the word is generally understood in this latter sense; as, he is manifestly a scholar. Pupil signifies one under the close personal supervision or instruction of a teacher or tutor. Those under instruction in schools below the academic grade are technically and officially termed pupils. The word pupil is uniformly so used in the Reports of the Commissioner of Education of the United States, but popular American usage prefers scholar in the original sense; as, teachers and scholars enjoyed a holiday. Those under instruction in Sunday-schools are uniformly designated as Sunday-school scholars. Student is applied to those in the higher grades or courses of study, as the academic, collegiate, scientific, etc. Student suggests less proficiency than scholar in the highest sense, the student being one who is learning, the scholar one who has learned. On the other hand, student suggests less of personal supervision than pupil; thus, the college student often becomes the private pupil of some instructor in special studies. For disciple, etc., compare synonyms for ADHERENT.—Ant.: dunce, fool, idiot, idler, ignoramus, illiterate person.

Syn. art, knowledge. Knowledge of a single fact, not known as related to any other, or of many facts not known as having any mutual relations or as comprehended under any general law, does not reach the meaning of science; science is knowledge reduced to law and embodied in system. The knowledge of various countries gathered by an observant traveler may be a heterogeneous medley of facts, which gain real value only when coordinated and arranged by the man of science. Art always relates to something to be done, science to something to be known. Not only must art be discriminated from science, but art in the industrial or mechanical sense must be distinguished from art in the esthetic sense; the former aims chiefly at utility, the latter at beauty. The mechanic arts are the province of the artisan, the esthetic or fine arts are the province of the artist; all the industrial arts, as of weaving or printing, arithmetic, or navigation, are governed by exact rules. Art in the highest esthetic sense, while it makes use of rules, transcends all rule; no rules can be given for the production of a painting like Raffael's "Transfiguration," a statue like the Apollo Belvedere, or a poem like the Iliad. Science does not, like the mechanic arts, make production its direct aim, yet its possible productive application in the arts is a constant stimulus to scientific investigation; the science, as in the case of chemistry or electricity, is urged on to higher development by the demands of the art, while the art is perfected by the advance of the science. Creative art seeking beauty for its own sake is closely akin to pure science seeking knowledge for its own sake.
